WISH I'D THOUGHT OF THIS GAG IN THE FIRST PLACE!

Bertie Bird and his brother Billie peered over the branch that held their nest home in Apple Tree Lane, watching the Family from the Big House load packages into their car.

"I wonder where they're going," Bertie cried. "Let's follow them!"

"It seems perfectly safe," Billie agreed. "I haven't seen Tabby Cat get into the car."

When the Family drove off, the two bluebirds followed swiftly, until the car stopped. Bertie and Billie perched on a nearby tree and waited expectantly.

"My," they heard the mother of the Family exclaim, "this is a perfect spot."

"It certainly is," the father agreed. "Bobbie can go swimming and we can have our picnic lunch right here."

"A PICNIC!" Bertie Bird gasped delightedly. "I'm so glad we came!"

When little Bobbie headed for the water, Bertie called gayly, "Come on, Billie, let's take a dip ourselves and work up an appetite."

A moment later, Bertie landed with a ker-PLOP in the water.

"Ooof! That feels good!" he laughed.

"Watch out!" Billie cried suddenly when he saw a big wave rolling in towards Bertie.

There was a roar of water, and Bertie went down, only to float to the surface a moment later with a very dazed expression on his face.

"Are you all right?" Billie asked anxiously. "Shall we stay for the picnic or do you want to go home?"

Bertie Bird's eyes opened wide. "Picnic!" he remembered. "Come ON!"

As they started back towards the picnic spot, they saw little Bobbie laughing and splashing in the water.

"I wonder where the father is," Billie commented. "Bobbie really shouldn't be left alone in the water."

"You're right. The waves are dangerous!" Bertie said with feeling. "Let's go and get his father."

The two little bluebirds flew to the father's shoulder and tugged hard on his shirt.

"Why, hallo," the father greeted them. "What are you two doing here?"

"I think they are trying to tell you something," the mother cried. "I wonder if Bobbie . . ."

With that, the father was on his way. Just as he got to the beach, a big wave started rolling and roaring in toward Bobbie. But the father was running fast. He reached the crying, terrified boy and swooped him high in the air just seconds before the big whitecap broke.

Later, while Bobbie rested, the mother mused, "I wonder if those wonderful little birds would like to share our picnic." And she opened the jars and bowls of food and put a big portion of everything on a plate. "Here," she said gratefully, "help yourselves."

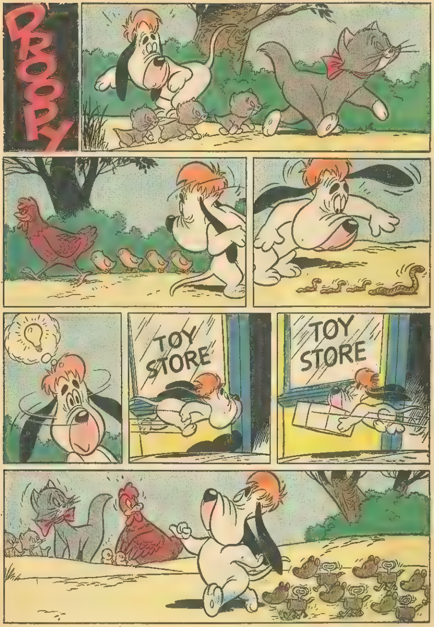

Bertie Bird and Brother Billie gobbled away happily until, suddenly, there was a sound from the big wicker basket, and two amber eyes peered out. It was Tabby Cat, springing into the air.

"I forgot Tabby!" the mother cried

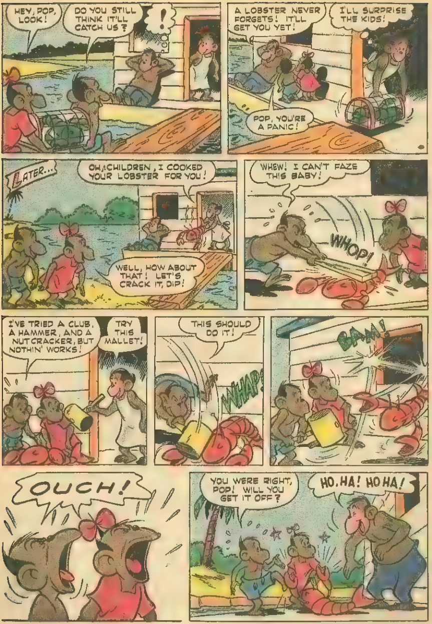

"NOW she tells us," Bertie muttered as he and Billie darted away from Tabby's claws.

"I'll get him," the father shouted. "Nothing is going to disturb those little birds today!"

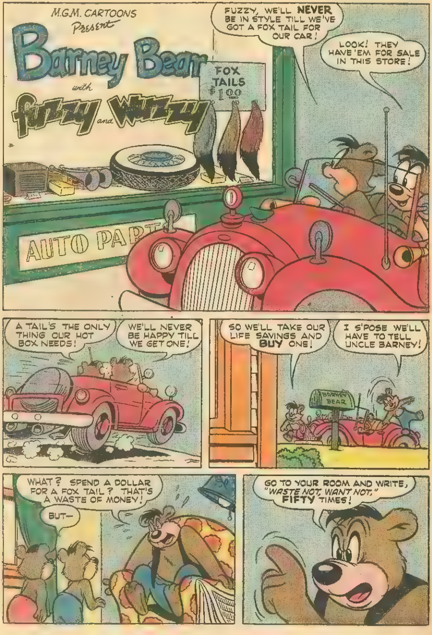

Tabby was locked in the car and Bertie Bird and Brother Billie continued to enjoy their picnic after such a very exciting adventure.
